Larry Savell Rocks: “(She’s An) Electronic Discovery”

Posted by Peter Lattman

Yesterday we celebrated the musical work of Larry Savell, a longtime lawyer at Chadbourne & Parke in New York. To spread the holiday cheer, we said between now and Christmas we’re going to pepper the blog with a few lyrics from Savell’s latest release.

You can catch a snippet of Savell’s singing on his Web site, but let’s just say his lyrics are terrific and leave it at that. The Law Blog appreciates passion and self-deprecation, and Savell has both those qualities in spades. “I’m such a lousy singer it takes a lot of takes to make something palatable,” Savell told us last year. “But it’s a labor of love.”

Here’s our first entry, an excerpt from “(She’s An) Electronic Discovery” — a lawyer’s love song that pulls at the heart strings:

Late night doc review for a case
Was the first time ever I saw her face
Bates number a million two one
Was “Employees Have Some Fun in the Sun”
“Come hither” smile ‘neath a tropical hat
Accessible in her native format
In photographic preservation
No evidence of spoliation.
(She’s An) Electronic Discovery
Like an e mail she sends me
If I meta, then I’d data
But our love is stuck in beta.
